A a, Roman; A a, Italian; both of most general use in writing the European languages; A a, English Saxon; 𝔄 𝔞, English black letter, nearly, as all the rest, resembling that of the German alphabet; Α ἀ, Greek, called alpha, from the Hebrew א aleph, which, as all the letters in the Hebrew tongue are significant, denotes either an ox, or a leader; marks of excellence and priority. The first place is deservedly given to this letter on the account of its simplicity, being little more than an opening of the mouth; and its sound as a vowel, (for it is properly a radical consonant, as are all the rest) is determined by the adjunct vowel, if it hath any, if not, it is silent, and hath no sound. From this use of the Hebrews, the later Greeks seem to have taken their note of an easy breathing, which they prefixed to all words beginning with a slender sound, as in ἀπὸ, ἐπὶ, &c. to distinguish them from those which begin with an aspirate; as in ἅμα, ἑκὰς. This was done after they had divested the eighth letter H of the consonant power which it held in their ancient alphabet conformably to the Hebrew, to make use of its figure in denoting the long power of the vowel E. But the Latins followed them not herein, having formed their language from the ancient Eolians and Ionians, who had only the Cadmean alphabet of sixteen letters. But to proceed, the Latin and English A hath the same power and figure as the Greek; but its name, as likewise the rest of the letters, from the simple sound a, bé, cé, &c. In English we have a threefold sound of this vowel; short, as in bat, cat, &c. like the Hebrew pathahh; long, as in dāte, fāte, &c. mixt with o, obscure, as in call, fall, where we hear the same sound as in olive, hollow, save that in the former it is long, conformably to the Heb. ר kametz, but in the latter short, conformably to ר; chateph kametz. It is greatly to be wished that we had more letters expressive of vocal sounds; or marks on those we have, to ascertain their power in the same syllable; as in fallow, falling; or in those which are analogous, as in cost, most, &c. The want hereof equally affects our Latin pronunciation; for we pronounce mălus and mālus, pater and mater with the same sound, which we can scarcely think the Latins did. We are indeed more secure in the Greek tongue, because directed by more vowels, and the use of accents. But to return; A before e, and before u, in the same syllable, makes two diphthongs, æ, and au, whereof the former in Latin is substituted both for αι the proper, and ᾳ the improper diphthong of the Greeks, as in Αἰνείας, Æneas, τῇ σφαίρᾳ, sphæræ; as, on the contrary, the ancient Latins in their own words, when they had occasion to divide their æ, changed it into the Greek αι; as in aulaï, pictaï, frugiferaï. Some make ai a Latin diphthong, as in aio, Caius; but in ais, and ait, i manifestly feſtly belongs to the latter ſyllable, and the Greeks write not Γαῖ©ς, but Γάϊος; whence it ſeems to be very manifeſt that ai in the Latin tongue is not a diphthong, as in the Greek. As there is a mutual intercourſe between all the vowels with each other, ſo in this o is changed into e; as in lacto, delacto, ago, egi; ſo e into a, as in decem, decanus, aveo, avarus; a into i, as in apiſcor, adipiſcor; ſo i, into a, as reipſa, reapſe; a into o, as in ſparta, ſportum, taxus, taxicum; o into a, as in foveo, favilla, volvo, valvæ; a, into u, as in camera, cumira, taberna, contubernium; u, into a, as in glubo, glaber, μυδάω, madeo. In the Roman comitia, or aſſemblies for making laws, the people had two tables: in the one were two letters, U. R. uti rogas, ſignifying their aſſent; becauſe a motion for a new law to be made was called rogatio: in the other this letter A. i. e. antiquo, or antiqua probo, to ſhew their diſſent. In capital cauſes they had alſo two tables covered with wax, in one whereof was this letter A. i. e. abſolvo; in the other C. for condemno; whence the former is by Tully pro Milone, called ſalutaris, the latter triſtis. In numerals it denoted antiently 500, and Ā 5000. Other uſes of this, and the reſt of the letters, in the compendious notes of the ancients, are too many to be here enumerated; I have therefore under this, as well as the following letters, explained thoſe which moſt frequently occur, referring the explanation of the reſt to a more general Collection thereof out of Sertorius Urſatus, and others; which may be of uſe, ſometimes even to the learned themſelves, in reading ancient inſcriptions found upon Roman monuments and coins. A, Lat. ab A, a Græc. Nam formas literarum veteres Græcas penè eaſdem fuiſſe, quæ ſuo tempore fuerunt Latinæ, teſtatur Plinius. 7, 58. Hanc vocalem ut inſuaviſſimam notat Cicero in Orat. 49. quod tamen de crebrâ ejus repetitione accipiendum; nam in eâ ſæpius iteratâ aſperitatem notavit etiam Martianus Capella. Sæpe quidem in alias atque alias vocales mutatur, tam longas, quàm correptas, aliquando fortè ſuavioris ſoni causâ; ſed cùm hoc commune habeat cum reliquis vocalibus, imò & conſonis, nihil hinc à primæ literæ dignitate abſcedere videtur.

B b. The second letter, but first consonant in the alphabet, is a labial, and pronounced by shutting the lips, which A had opened. Among the mutes it hath a middle place and power, between the smooth and easy sound of P, and the aspirate and rougher sound of Ph, F, and V; every one of which, in the derivation and inflection of words, is frequently, for the better sound, changed into some of the other; so from βόσκω comes pasco, from ἀπὸ ab, from labor, lapsus; from scribo, scripsi: thus b, always continuing in the inflection of such words before a vowel; but, because it would otherwise be too hard, before a consonant it is softened into p: thus from rubeo comes rufus; from θρίαμβος, triumphus; from φάλαινα, balæna; from βρέμω, fremo; from γίλβω, gilvus; from אב, avus. In some Latin words, b and v are indifferently written, as sebum and sevum; so also b and p; as Publicola and Poplicola; and b and f, as bubalus and bufalus. B is sometimes inserted in the middle of words for the better sound, as in ambages, ambio, amburo, &c. is servile in the inflection of the dative and ablative plural of the third, fourth, and fifth declensions of the Latin nouns; as likewise in those of the præterimperfect and future tenses; as also in the first and second conjugations.

C. The third letter, but second consonant, may indeed be copied immediately from the Hebrew כ, being exactly the same, only in complaisance to our way of writing, turning towards the right: yet is much more probably framed from the Greek Γ, its right and perpendicular line, for the more ease and quick dispatch in writing, instead of an angle, degenerating into a semicircle. For it is evident, that the Latin letters are many of them exactly the same with the Greek; and most of the rest, which are common to both tongues, differ no more, than haste, conveniency of writing, or, perhaps, some novel, and growing depravation might probably occasion. And I may add also, That many words, natives of Greece, were made denizens of Rome, without any formality of changing their garb, especially those of Dorick families; others again, in pretty near proportion between their number of words and letters, suffer some change, to be more civilly treated there: besides, it is notorious that the Roman youth were anciently taught both to read, and write their own language by Greek masters. This I judge proper to observe here once for all, and proceed. The rank which C holds in the Latin Alphabet, answering that of Γ in the Greek, is a further evidence of this extraction: besides, when the Greeks in their own letters expreis a pure Latin word, where this letter is found, they commonly substitute Γ or Κ, for Cajus Cæsar, writing Γαῖος Καῖσαρ. Yea, in many Latin words c and g are indifferently written; as, Cajus Cnæus, or Gajus Gnæus. But before I go further, I must do a piece of justice to this letter, by declaring, that though it acknowledge the Greek Γ for its parent, yet it may challenge the same regard from the Latin letters g and k, and, in the opinion of some learned men, from q also: the first whereof was not known to the Romans, till after the first Punick war. This is plainly proved from the royal laws, where Acnom is writ for Agnum, Acrom for Agrum; and that famous remaining piece of antiquity, the monumental pillar of Duilius, where we read Lecio pucnandod, exfociont, &c. for Legio pugnando effugiunt. As for K, it appears never to have been much used, and is now so obsolete, that it is not written in more than two or three Latin words, where c is always indifferently, or perhaps better, used. And for Q, the indifferency found in writing very many Latin words therewith, or with C, as cur, or quur; quum, or cùm; locutus, or loquutus; cottidie, or quotidie, hath influenced many Criticks to deduce its original from c. But this shall be considered in its proper place. The name of C, if we attend to analogy, is always Kè, as is its sound before all vowels; and never Sè. And here, with much reluctance, I remark, that foreigners, who own we understand Latin perfectly, and write it correctly, account us little better than barbarians, in several parts of pronunciation; but in none more justly, than our depraved sound of this letter before æ, œ, e, i, and, y, as if it were S; which at the same time our learned men confess to differ from the ancient usage of Greece, and Rome, to be unreasonable in itself, and to introduce duce a ſtrange confuſion in words and things; ſo that cædo, and ſedo; cæpi, and ſepi; cenſus and ſenſus; cicer, and ſiſer; cygni, and ſigni, and many thouſands more, have with us, one and the ſame ſound. Hence alſo it comes to paſs, that its ſound is entirely loſt after ſ; ſo that cæna, and ſcena; celeris, and ſceleris, and innumerable words of the ſame kind, are confounded. This I humbly leave to the conſideration and redreſs of the learned ſchool-maſters of this kingdom, as very well deſerving it, and return to its true ſound; which is the ſame with that uſurped by the exploded K, and ſtands related to the harder ſound of g, as p to b; and therefore in the inflection of words before a vowel is changed into c before a conſonant; as ago, actum, not agtum; lego, lectum, not legtum; juſt as ſcribo, ſcriptum. Neither ought it to be ſounded with an aſpirate, as the modern Italians do, who ſay chichindela, Chichero, &c. for cicindela, Cicero. Concerning its intercourſe with ſ, and t, the tenuis of the third claſs of Mutes, I rather chooſe to treat in the diſſertation upon thoſe letters, leſt I ſhould be thought too tedious in this. A.

[à κώμη, vicus, & ᾠδή, cantus, quòd initio in vicis juvenes cantare ſoliti eſſent, antequam in urbes conveniſſent, Feſt.] A comedy, o. interlude. See the commendation, uſe, and end of it, in Donatus's preface to Terence; its definition in Scal. Poët 1, 5. It is either old, or new. The old, whereof Eupolis, Cratinus, and Ariſtophanes were maſters, is deſcribed by Quint. 10, 1. and the exceſs of liberty, its greateſt fault, by Cic. 4. De Repub. Quo genere jocandi, eleganti, urbano, ingenioſo, faceto, Plautus noſter, & antiqua comœdia referta eſt, Id. Off. 1, 104. Menander, Poſidippus, Diphilus, Apollodorus, were the principal authors of the new; which differed from the old almoſt in every thing; in matter, manner, time, furniture, ſtyle, and verſe. Their matter was amoſt as copious as that of ſatire; every action and perſon, even the greateſt commanders and princes not being excepted, and herein more blame-worthy, becauſe it reflected on the good as well as bad. See Cicero in the place quoted. The new took its arguments from common life, as it did alſo its perſons, who were generally young gentlemen in love, and their ſervants tricking their old maſters, to gratify their young ones. The old flouriſhed about the time of the Peloponneſian war; the new when Greece had loſt its liberty. The furniture of the old was very large, of the new very ſmall; the chorus being entirely taken away. The ſtyle of the old was epick, or ſatirical; of the new, mean, or low. The old admitted all kinds of verſe; the new, the iambick only. The neceſſary parts of both are four, viz. the Protaſis, the Epitaſis, the Cataſtaſis, and the Cataſtrophe; which ſee in their places.
